Rhine Channel Dredging Project

With the completion of the Upper Newport Bay dredging project, officials turn their focus now to the dredging of Newport Harbor's Lower Bay to remove approximately 200,000 cubic yards of contaminated and 'high priority' waste from the channel before January 2012. For quite some time now, boaters shouldered the frustration of navigating around some of the shoaling throughout the channel resulting in areas around the harbor where water depth can be as shallow as 5 feet. The Army Corps of Engineers has voiced this frustration to city officials and conveyed the importance of maintaining Newport Harbor's federal channels, making sure that water quality, environmental hazards and travel safety standards are being met for boaters. The entire project calls for 1.2 million cubic yards of sediment to be dredged from the harbor, totaling $25 million since some of the waste requires special disposal. With officials and the Corps moving as quickly as possible to finalize the details for the disposal, all other plans are underway making sure that the project is completed with minimal disturbance to boaters cruising in and out of the Harbor this year.
